LAKE GENEVA — Sal Dimiceli knows what it's like to go to bed hungry, to live in the dark, to watch his mother, the strongest woman he knew, cry.

But he considers his meager beginnings a blessing in disguise.

A child of poverty, who "miraculously" encountered financial success as an adult, Dimiceli made a vow to help good people who have fallen on hard times.

"I cannot know there's someone out there hurting and just sit here with a nest egg," he said.

Dimiceli donated money to charitable organizations for years until his financial adviser told him to take a closer look at their books. Dimiceli quickly learned that many organizations used the money to pay for overhead costs.

Frustrated, Dimiceli wanted to start his own charitable organization—one with no overhead, one where every penny would go to help people in need. In 1989, he founded The Time is Now to Help, a nonprofit organization that provides poverty-stricken people with life's basic necessities: rent, utilities, food, clothing, toiletries, household items and transportation.

"I went out and looked for people," Dimiceli said of his initial work. "I have a sixth sense about people who need help."

He verifies every request for assistance himself, making sure money is spent wisely and where it's most needed.

Wanting to be humble in the eyes of God, Dimiceli remains relatively anonymous.

"People aren't supposed to be saying, 'Hi, this is what I'm doing for God,'" he said. "It takes away the impact of what you're doing."

Dimiceli went somewhat public only four years ago, occasionally revealing his identity—albeit under a pen name—in a column that appears weekly in two local newspapers.

"He keeps himself under the radar," said Shannon Bray, president of Side by Side, a nonprofit human-concerns organization that helps local residents in Lake Geneva.

"It's not about him," Bray said. "He doesn't do it to make himself feel good. They're just things that need to be done."

"His regular job and his life end up being part time," said Frank Guske of Lake Geneva, a local Scoutmaster who has worked with his troops to help food pantries in Walworth County.

"This is his gig."

Dimiceli believes his experience in poverty was God's way of preparing him for his true life's work.

"It was overwhelming for me as a little child, but that ... has never left me," he said. "That's why I'm here. I want to help. That's my purpose."

Bray said Dimiceli is a born leader.

"People want to follow what he's doing," she said. "He brings out things in people they didn't know they had."

As such, a network of more than 40,000 people strong has built around Time is Now, allowing the organization to help about 500 people each year.

"He's like Lake Geneva's little disciple," Guske said.
